The book's concentration isn't on a particular historical event, but rather on the basic ideas that shape the creation and explanation of global agreements. Furio posits that the procedure of negotiation and ratification is not a neutral one, but is significantly shaped by the geopolitical landscape at hand. He challenges the accepted view that treaties are simply formal documents, instead presenting them as results of complicated power struggles.

Furio uses a varied approach, drawing upon various theoretical frameworks from political science. He skillfully integrates historical examples with theoretical insights to build a convincing story of how international agreements are created and how their significance can change over time. The book's central theme itself serves as a strong analogy for this mechanism. While not an actual historical document, it represents the idealized outcome of a effective international negotiation. However, Furio quickly challenges this illusion by analyzing the intrinsic inconsistencies and power imbalances that inevitably arise during such deliberations.

This perspective is highly significant in the modern intricate global environment, where the impact of geopolitical factors on the creation and implementation of global treaties remains paramount.

The book's prose is understandable yet thorough. Furio effectively integrates theoretical depth with concise summaries and relevant examples. This makes the book perfect for both scholars and those curious about international relations with an curiosity in international law.
