Korean Buddhist Nuns and Laywomen: Hidden Histories, Enduring Vitality

The narrative of Korean Buddhist nuns and laywomen is a mosaic woven with threads of devotion, resistance, and endurance. For centuries, their contributions have been underrepresented in historical accounts, relegated to the margins of official narratives. However, recent scholarship and a renewed interest in gender studies are exposing the richness of their experiences, illuminating their profound impact on Korean Buddhism and society as a whole. This article will explore the hidden histories of these remarkable women, showcasing their enduring vitality and continued importance in contemporary Korea.

The early history of Korean Buddhism saw the appearance of nuns, though their roles were often constrained by patriarchal structures. While monastic life offered a path to spiritual development, it also involved submission to male authority. Yet, within this framework, women found ways to manifest their agency. They established their own communities, developed unique spiritual practices, and played a crucial role in safeguarding Buddhist teachings and traditions, particularly during periods of oppression. For example, the role of "pocha", woman Buddhist practitioners who served as intermediaries between monks and lay communities, highlights their significant influence in shaping religious life.

The impact of laywomen is equally significant. They were integral to the monetary viability of many temples, contributing through gifts of land, resources, and labor. They also participated actively in various aspects of religious practice, comprising ritual performances, chanting, and the passing on of Buddhist teachings within their families and communities. Their devotion often exceeded that of male counterparts, reflected in their prolific acts of benevolence and acts of spiritual commitment.

The Joseon dynasty (1392-1897) presented special challenges for both nuns and laywomen. Confucian ideology, which gained prominence during this period, reinforced patriarchal norms and curtailed women's roles in public life. This led to a decline in the number of nuns and a diminishment of their influence. However, even under these difficult conditions, women continued to practice Buddhism in private spaces, safeguarding their traditions and beliefs through descendants. The resilience shown during this era is a testament to the enduring nature of Korean Buddhist women.

The 20th and 21st centuries have witnessed a revival of interest in the role of women in Korean Buddhism. The increasing understanding of gender issues and the rise of feminist Buddhist scholarship have introduced a new perspective on their historical contributions. Modern-day nuns and laywomen are increasingly involved in leadership roles within the Buddhist community, advocating for social justice, environmental preservation, and peace. They are questioning traditional gender roles and forming a more comprehensive vision of Korean Buddhism.

The study of Korean Buddhist nuns and laywomen is not merely an academic endeavor; it offers important insights into the interactions of religion, gender, and power. It shows the intricacy of religious traditions and the ways in which individuals navigate their identities within societal contexts.
